Washington County Voters Can Trust in the Integrity of Their Elections

WASHINGTON COUNTY Tenn. – With accurate election information from the Washington County Election Commission and Tennessee’s #1 Election Integrity Ranking, Washington County voters can cast their ballot with confidence.

“While administering elections, our office follows Tennessee’s election laws which ensure that every eligible voter’s ballot is counted once and only once,” said Washington County Certified Administrator of Elections, Dana Jones. “Washington County voters can trust in our election process.”

Tennessee was recently found to have the most secure elections in the country by The Heritage Foundation. This ranking is a result of the laws protecting the integrity of the ballot box passed by the Tennessee General Assembly and administered by the Secretary of State and the Washington County Election Commission.

The Washington County election administrator, bipartisan county election commission, election staff, and a bipartisan team of local citizens serving as poll officials ensure the accurate tabulation of election results.

Before every election, the Washington County Election Commission publicly tests the voting machines. Washington voting machines are not connected to the internet. After the election, the Washington County Election Commission confirms the results of every race before the election is certified.

“My office works with the Washington County Election Commission to make it easy to register to vote, get accurate election information and cast a ballot without weakening election security,” said Secretary of State Tre Hargett. “In Washington County, it’s easy to vote and hard to cheat.”

In Washington County, the Washington County Election Commission and the Secretary of State’s Division of Elections are the trusted sources for the election information voters need.
